Beyond Human Skin is an audiovisual project composed of moving image, photography, and animation. The work emerged from a simple question: what remains of the human if we stop imagining it as autonomous, closed, and separated from the rest of the living world?

The project explores the body as a porous and multispecies ecosystem, continuously shaped through coexistence with microorganisms, environments, and other forms of life. Through moving image, photography, illustration, and animation, the work investigates relationships between the visible and invisible, the human and the more-than-human. Illustration and animation become tools for imagining microscopic presences and ecological entanglements that escape direct human perception.

The project originates from a desire to question anthropocentric understandings of the body and rethink the human as part of a multispecies ecology.

The project is informed by Lynn Margulis' concept of the holobiont, which understands the organism together with its associated microbial communities as a multispecies assemblage; Karen Barad's notion of intra-action, through which entities emerge relationally rather than existing independently of their relations; and Donna Haraway's concept of becoming-with, which understands beings as constituted through ongoing, situated relationships with other species and forms of life. These ideas, together with ecofeminist critiques of anthropocentrism and hierarchical divisions between humans and the more-than-human world, shaped my understanding of the human body as relational, porous, and continuously co-constituted within a multispecies world.

The project was developed through an intuitive and site-responsive process in Sicily, a territory with which I have a deeply personal connection. Rather than following a fixed script, the work emerged through observation and intuitive filming.
