

SLIME MOLD ORACLE PROJECT

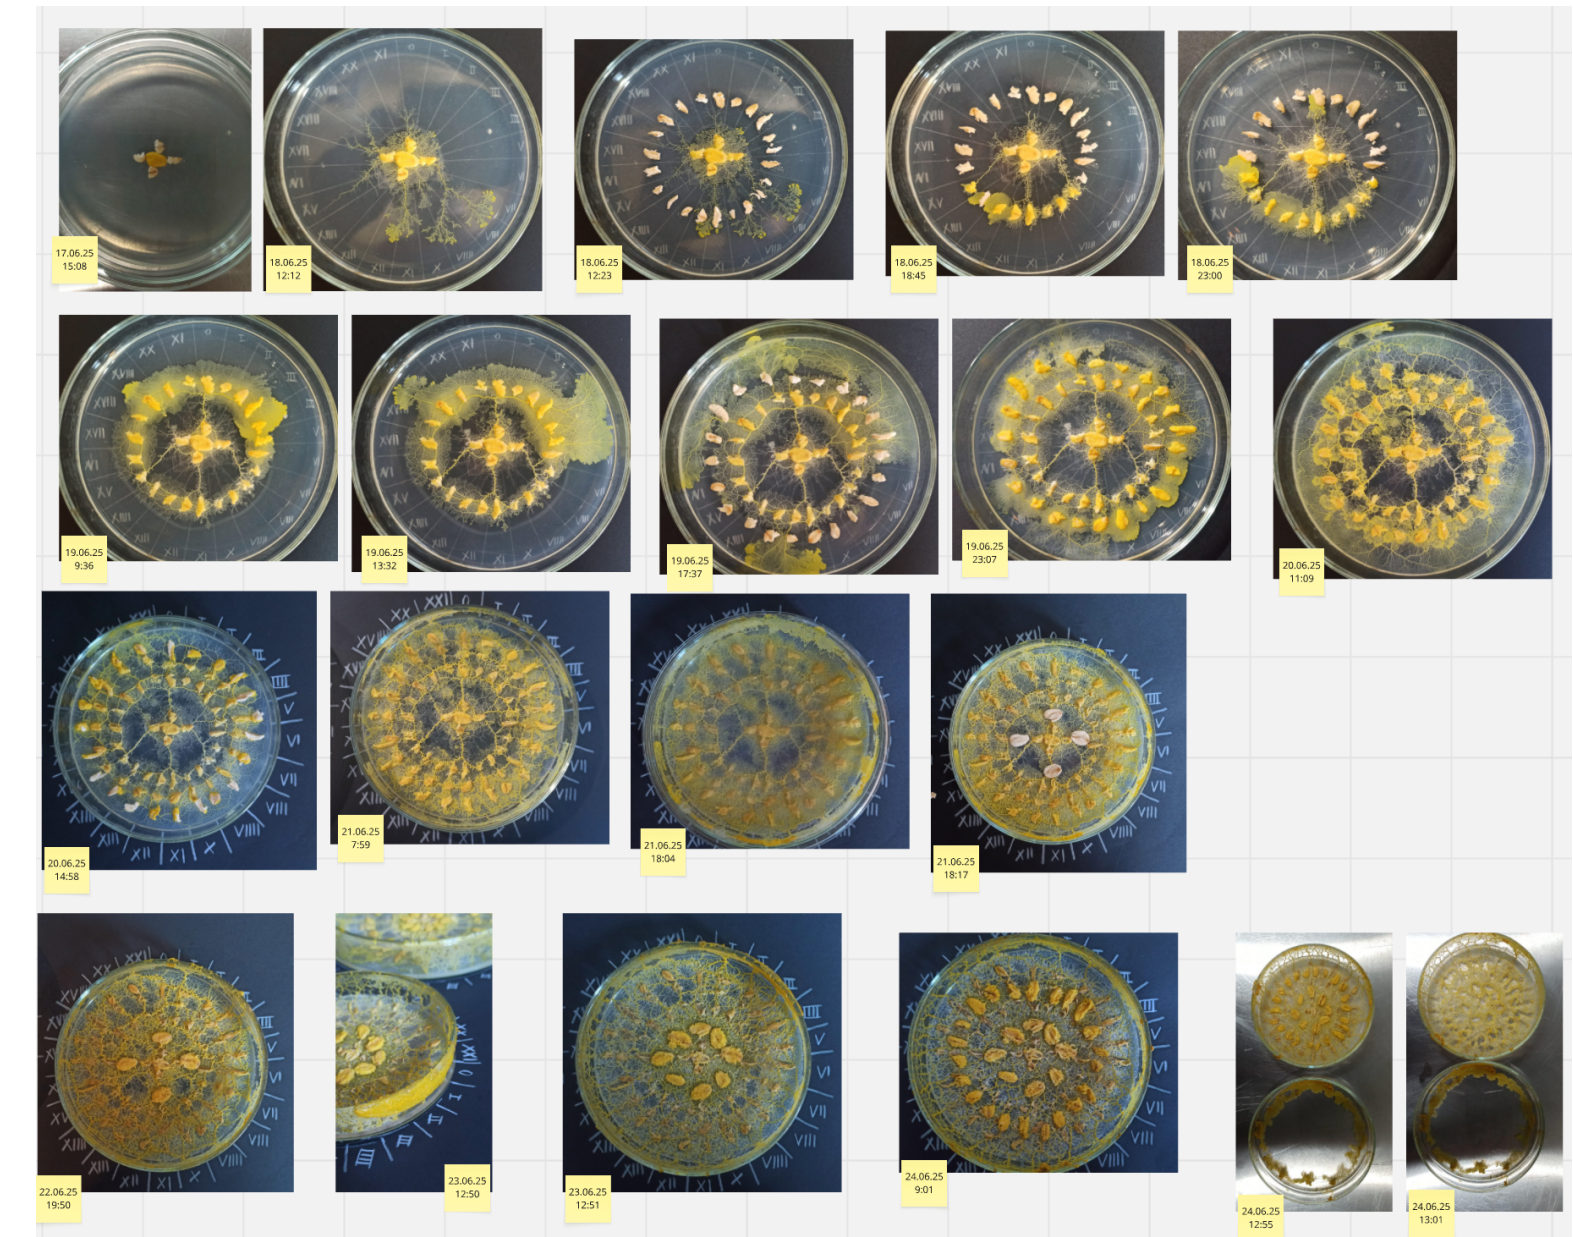

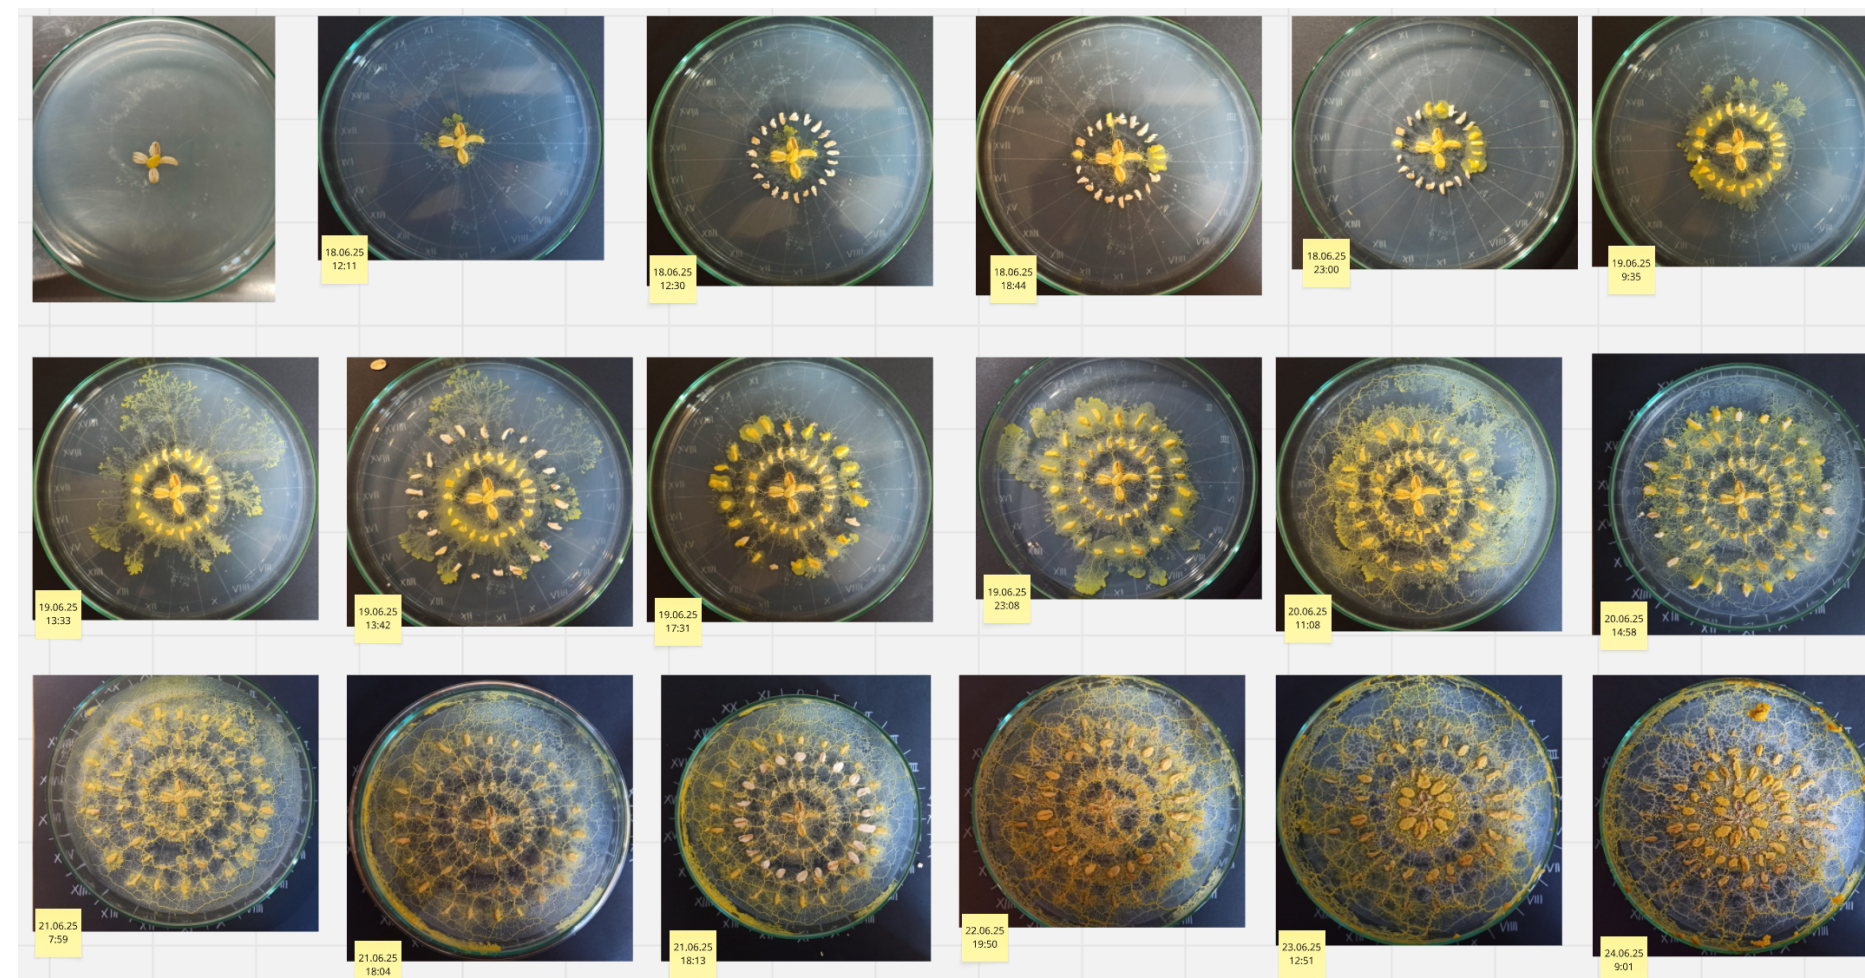

Participatory experiment / living installation / speculative ritual. 2025

Slime Mold Oracle began as an experiment in communication and collaboration with a more-than-human organism. Using a circular system of Tarot cards connected through oats, the project followed the slime mold's growth as it moved across the cards, generating symbolic associations and evolving narratives through its own behavior.

What initially started as a personal reading gradually shifted into a collaborative and process-based practice, where the unfolding symbolic system no longer appeared centered on me, the human participant, but potentially on the slime mold itself.

The project investigates how collaboration with more-than-human life might challenge anthropocentric ideas of authorship, communication, and control. What initially began as a personal interpretative exercise gradually shifted toward a process centered on the slime mold itself – its movements, rhythms, and ways of generating connections. This transformation raised questions around whose narrative was actually unfolding, and why the symbolic journey should necessarily belong to the human participant rather than to the organism itself.

The project draws from more-than-human and posthuman perspectives questioning human-centered ideas of intelligence, communication, and authorship. Tarot was approached not simply as a divinatory tool, but as a symbolic and non-linear language capable of generating meaning through relationships, intuition, and association rather than fixed verbal communication.

The work was also informed by Alejandro Jodorowsky's understanding of Tarot as a dynamic relational system, where meaning emerges through the connections between cards and through the process of interpretation itself.
